Continuum of Restorative Practices

- The Restorative Practices Continuum can be used proactively to help students, teachers, and all community members help create a sense of positive affect and to deal with those negative affective moments.
- Affective statements, questions, impromptu conversations, and circles can be used to help teach students to express themselves and gain a better perspective of how their actions impact the environment around them.
- This can be used responsively by utilizing circles and formal conferences to address issues such as bullying and physical altercations.
- While restorative techniques are a good way to respond to wrong doing, they are equally important as proactive measures to avoid potential problems.
- 80% of restorative practices are intended to be done proactively, while the other 20% should be devoted to responding to conflict.
